

ABSTRACT

A method of generating and assigning identifying tags to sound files according to standardized criteria that result in substantially unique tags while minimizing differences in sound files that are ideally identical. A number of points in the sound file's unique frequency domain are chosen to create a position in N dimensional space, and this position is used to determine similarities and differences among sound files.